The Origins of Canadian Settlers in Southern Michigan, 1820–1850

CNOH
Mar 1987

GREGORY S. ROSE

There is a long history of migration between Canada and Michigan. The first white inhabitants in strategic portions of the state, including the Detroit area, Sault Ste. Marie, and the Straits of Mackinac, were French Canadians.[1] They probably formed a majority of Michigan's non-Indian population until 1825, when a flood of New Yorkers and New Englanders began entering southern Michigan and establishing the region's strongly Yankee character.[2] Shortly after, Canadian migration to the state increased, but its main source shifted from Lower Canada (Quebec), which was largely ethnic French, to Upper Canada (Ontario), which was primarily ethnic British.[3] The link between Canada and Michigan eventually became so strong, one author claims, that "at least one of every four Michigan family researchers finds a direct Ontario connection, and many find ancestral ties to Quebec."[4] Such a statement is supported by birthplace data, first collected by the census bureau in 1850: Canadians formed Michigan's largest foreign population group from 1850 until 1960, with the exception of 1860 when they were second largest.[5] Their numbers grew continuously between 1850 and 1880 and, although they never constituted more than 10 per cent of the total population, they usually accounted for at least one-quarter of the foreign-born.

Despite the presence of a significant number of Canadians among the inhabitants of mid-nineteenth-century Michigan, few records were left by them and relatively little has been written about them.[6] The purpose of this paper is to address this deficiency in Canadian-American population history. Since most of the earliest settlers of Upper Canada were natives of the United States and since by 1850 that province had provided Michigan with most of its Canadians, the effect of American settlers on the Upper Canada frontier between approximately 1780 and 1815 must be considered first. Factors encouraging migration from Canada to Michigan after 1825 are noted, and the state-wide distribution of Canadians in 1850 and 1880 is also shown. But the particular contribution of this article is the presentation, for the first time, of detailed statistical data concerning the origins and distribution of Canadians living in southern Michigan by 1850. Three sources provide the evidence used: the 1850 manuscript census, Tract Books collected by the General Land Office, and the Michigan Pioneer Record.

The Canadians who crossed the border between 1820 and 1850 entered the mainstream of Michigan life easily. Most spoke English, so that they did not have a language barrier to overcome, although the Francophones also seem to have been assimilated fairly rapidly.[7] Canadians and Americans were quite similar in other ways. In both nations, inhabitants and new immigrants were interested in economic self-improvement, both countries were expanding their frontiers westward, and both peoples shared a common outlook, perhaps best described as the "pioneer spirit". Canadians and Americans usually came from the same ethnic background, and many Canadian settlers in Michigan had historical ties to the United States, for they or their ancestors had lived there. Some had left the States during or shortly after the American Revolution, choosing to remain loyal to the Crown, and were no longer welcome in the United States; some felt safer on the Canadian frontier, where relations between Indians and whites were relatively friendly.[8] For many others the political impetus for removal was unimportant: available and inexpensive land in sparsely settled parts of Canada plus an assured market for their products in Britain during the Napoleonic Wars enticed them across the border.[9] The simple lure of land was the reason given by a native Pennsylvanian who lost his holdings during the War of 1812 but remained enthusiastic about Upper Canada: "In the year 1808 [I] moved with my family to the province of Upper Canada, in order to obtain land upon easy terms, (as did most of the inhabitants now there) and for no other reason"; his view was that in Upper Canada "the means of obtaining land have been extremely easy".[10]

Although some Loyalists were among the immigrants to Canada, economic opportunity rather than political allegiance seems to have attracted most settlers before the War of 1812. The international boundary was not a barrier to migration: United States natives went wherever land was available, whether on the southern or northern shores of the eastern Great Lakes.[11] By the time war broke out, so many Americans had crossed the border that their settlements lined the Canadian side of Lake Erie.[12] In a gazetteer published in 1813, Michael Smith estimated that 80 per cent of the 136,000 whites in Upper Canada came from the United States, but that only 25 per cent of them had been or were descendants of Loyalists.[13] Smith wrote that nearly all the pioneers living close to Lake Erie and in the upper Thames River valley were from Pennsylvania, New Jersey, or New York.[14] While Smith's estimate of the total population in Upper Canada was probably high, Fred Landon thought that his assessment of the American proportion was "probably near the mark".[15] Another researcher placed the number of Upper Canadian inhabitants at 75,000 in 1810, but again considered 80 per cent of the population to have been American with only one in four having Loyalist backgrounds.[16]

Whatever the exact population of Upper Canada and the American portion of it may have been in the early 1800s, the influence of settlers from the United States was apparent to all. One Canadian wrote in 1814:

> In the Upper Province the population is very scanty, and, with the exception of the Eastern District, are chiefly of American extraction. These settlers have been suffered to introduce themselves in such numbers that in most parts they form the majority, and, in many, almost the sole population.[17]

Many United States natives and their Canadian-born children became loyal citizens, but, observing the large and growing American presence, some Canadians worried about the future. Had war not broken out and American immigration not abated, claims one researcher, Upper Canada might have become "virtually an American colony"; during the war British and Canadian authorities feared that the combination of American military victories, settlers of non-Loyalist American origin, and continued American immigration would result in all of Canada being annexed by the United States.[18] Despite the determination of Canadian patriots and Loyalists to remain separate, by 1812 Upper Canada was in many ways under siege by the United States, for a strong American influence was felt in population, education, religion, agriculture, and throughout the economy.[19]

The outbreak of war dramatically altered American immigration to Upper Canada. While hostilities continued, land seekers from the northern United States avoided Canada and settled instead on the southern shore of Lake Erie or in the Ohio River Valley. During and after the war, strong anti-American feelings developed in Canada, and patriotic Canadians and British and Canadian government officials recognized that if Canada was to remain part of the British Empire, the immigration of loyal subjects had to increase and the immigration of Americans had to decrease. Laws were passed in Upper Canada and then throughout the colony to block any resurgence of American immigration and to encourage others to settle and develop empty territory, with the intention of increasing the number of inhabitants for defensive purposes, reducing the growing British population, and weakening the American influence already present.[20] Land owned by Americans who had not taken loyalty oaths or who had fled to the States during the war without the required passport was confiscated (Michael Smith, the gazetteer author, lost his land over the loyalty oath issue), inducements to attract American settlers were halted, and in 1815 the provincial governor was prohibited from granting land to Americans and ordered to try to prevent Americans from entering Ontario.[21] Since some Americans continued to come, a new tactic was tried. Land was not to be granted unless the recipient had lived in Canada for six months and had taken the oath of allegiance, but the oath was not to be administered to Americans because previous residence in the United States was considered evidence of hostility toward the Crown.[22] These actions, plus the greater availability of frontier land in the United States, caused a sharp decline in cross-border migration, and as a result Canadian landowners, speculators, and businessmen whose livelihoods depended on the continued influx of immigrants, most of whom had been Americans, felt severe economic hardship.[23] Canadian policy encouraged immigration from Europe, but until the 1840s the new settlers came slowly and they were often poorly prepared for frontier life.[24] Although restrictions against Americans were gradually lifted, lingering uncertainty about future government policies further deterred pioneers from choosing Canada. All of these factors lessened the American influence in Upper Canada after the War of 1812.

The migration relationship between the United States and Canada changed in another way during the 1820s, when the tide of settlers reversed itself and migration from Canada to the United States became dominant. Increasing numbers of Canadians joined the stream of pioneers to Michigan, particularly during the "Michigan Fever" of the 1830s when settlement boomed.[25] Despite initial reports to the contrary, there was good farming land in Michigan, and persons with vested interests in the state's growth promoted it as an ideal place for settlement.[26] Most of their publicity was directed at the northeastern United States, but Canadians also got the message. However, "boosterism" by Michiganians was just one factor encouraging greater immigration by Canadians. A scarcity of good inexpensive land emerged in Upper Canada during the 1820s, and in the next decade political problems formed another inducement to migration.

In 1825 land alienation policy in Canada underwent a radical alteration.[27] To encourage settlement and development, land had essentially been granted free before 1825, although a series of modifications to the policy reduced the size of the grants, toughened the qualification standards, charged surveyors' fees, required actual settlement on granted land, (a provision usually ignored), and taxed uncleared or "wild" land. Although the system was often abused, particularly by speculators who collected extensive tracts, the principle of free grants remained. But by the early 1820s it was clear that ungranted land with good agricultural potential in Upper Canada was in short supply. The legislation of 1825 was intended to reduce the wholesale giveaway of land by establishing a complex sales system, although certain people who met stringent requirements could still receive land free. The new policy made it more difficult for pioneer farmers to obtain land and allowed the prices of speculators' holdings to rise. In 1837 the situation was exacerbated when credit on land purchases was no longer offered and the full price was required in cash within fourteen days. Some relief came with the Land Act of 1841, which granted fifty acres free along settlement roads on the frontier in exchange for road work and permitted a fifty-acre grant to be added to a purchased plot of the same size if it had been cleared and cultivated. However, these alterations basically did not affect the reality of the situation: relatively little government land was left in Upper Canada, what remained was difficult to obtain, and huge, largely unsettled parcels were controlled by speculators selling at higher prices.

The limited supply of government acreage and the high cost of other land became a serious problem in Upper Canada during the 1820s and 1830s. Canada's next frontier of ungranted land, the western prairies, was not yet available for settlement.[28] Many Canadians and immigrants from Britain, discouraged by the high price of land in Upper Canada and the slowness of economic development, decided that the cheaper government land (with credit) and apparently greater economic opportunities in the United States were more attractive.[29] And for many reasons Americans no longer considered migrating to Canada. A newspaper in Brantford, Upper Canada, complained in 1835:

> Land in the western parts of our Province is held at too high a value to encourage much American emigration to our shores – for instance a tract of 100 acres of good land in Upper Canada can hardly be bought for £100 ($500), whereas in Michigan the same quantity of land can be obtained with as many dollars.[30]

Michigan was an accessible, available, and alluring frontier for Canadians, one that was quite similar to their former homes in climate, vegetation, and soil and on which the same agricultural products and practices were suitable.[31] Because fertile and inexpensive land could not be easily obtained at home, Upper Canadian pioneers "were obliged to center their plans for fortune upon the West of the Republic", and "to spread from Ontario across the St. Clair River into the wooded valleys of the rivers that flow into Saginaw Bay was a natural continuation of the movement that had brought Canadians to the shores of their own Georgian Bay".[32] The varied opportunities associated with the expansion of agriculture, settlements, commerce, and infant industries in southern Michigan, the opening of pineries in central and northern Michigan, the beginnings of mining in the Upper Peninsula, and the building of the state's transportation network, coupled with an economic depression in Canada, also lured many across the border.[33] In the aftermath of the abortive Rebellion of 1837 in Upper Canada, which had among its causes the scarcity of land, the cost of land, and economic stagnation, many rebels, sympathizers, and neutral Canadians who foresaw a bleak future fled to the United States, often choosing nearby and familiar Michigan.[34]

The large number of Canadians on the move elicited comment in public and private circles on both sides of the border. The dominant feeling among Canadians was alarm, expressed in this quotation from the October 1838 issue of the Canadian Christian Examiner:

> It seems generally agreed that emigration from this country to the United States is going on to a considerable extent. If this involved only the removal of the politically disaffected – those absolutely hostile to British institutions and connexion there would be little reason to regret it. But it is to be feared that many good subjects and useful members of the community are also withdrawing themselves.[35]

In another newspaper, Canadians were compared to "'swallows in autumn' preparing for their flight to the south".[36] A letter from St. Thomas, Ontario, in May 1838 claimed that "nearly one third of the Inhabitants have left and are leaving for the United States, all the leading Reformers are gone and a great many moderate Tories."[37] Another correspondent wrote: "emigration to the United States is the fear of the hour. It is indeed going on to an extent truly alarming and astonishing."[38] By the late 1840s, over twenty thousand Canadians and newly landed foreign immigrants were moving to the States annually, a large enough number that a select committee of the Canadian legislature was established in 1849 to investigate the situation.[39]

The Americans, meanwhile, expressed excitement and amazement. The magnitude of the migration is suggested by this description from the Detroit Free Press in June, 1838:

> The emigration to the new states from our neighboring province of Upper Canada in the present season is immense. A large number of families, well provided with money, teams, and farming utensils, have crossed over to this place within the last few weeks. Twelve covered waggons, well filled and drawn by fine horses, crossed over yesterday.[40]

Americans were pleased by the size of this movement because more settlers would speed Midwestern development, and some newspapers tried to encourage further immigration by reminding Canadians of the disappointing outcome of the late rebellion. A Cobourg newspaper reprinted the invitation issued by a Cincinnati editor: "Emigrate ye Canadians. If England will not treat you with decency, shake the dust from your feet, cross the border and build up a home where tyranny does not dare show its head."[41] Immigrants who had responded to the call sent back glowing accounts of their successes and prospects.[42] Many parts of the United States received the outflow from the north – the Buffalonian reported that "a cavalcade of waggons, containing the effects of 150 emigrants from the Johnstown District, U.C. passed our office yesterday on their way to Indiana", and New York and New England were very popular destinations – but by 1850 Michigan contained more Canadians than any other Midwestern state.[43]

There are scattered case histories of people who moved from Canada to Michigan, but to determine the magnitude of this migration with greater precision one must consult statistical records.[44] The rest of this article is devoted to a consideration of three statistical records that reveal the origins of Canadians living in southern Michigan by 1850. Southern Michigan was chosen because it contained over 98 per cent of the state's population in 1850, it was the state's agricultural core (farther north the climate is cooler and pineland soils poorer), and it lies directly west of the most heavily settled portions of Upper Canada. The first statistical record to be consulted is the United States population census, by far the most comprehensive source available. That of 1850 was the earliest to indicate the impact of Canadian also appear. Although the books are highly useful for migration research because of the locational detail they contain, some inherent biases must be noted. First, the records indicate previous residence rather than birthplace, and for many footloose migrants those were not the same. Second, only those who bought land directly from the government are listed, including actual farmers as well as speculators and agents for others but excluding all subsequent purchasers. Third, the records contain only the migrants who moved to rural areas or who bought rural land; settlers in towns and cities were rarely listed unless they were landowners. Finally, the tract books have sexual and age bias, for only the person actually filing for land, probably a male adult, reported a previous residence. If an entire family came one might expect everyone's former home to be the same, but that assumption cannot be verified from these records alone.

The land office data presented here indicate the previous residences of 379 individuals who came from Canada and purchased government land in southern Michigan by 1850, with most of the sales occurring after 1820. Upper Canada was the previous place of residence of 370 of the buyers, while 8 came from Lower Canada and one from Nova Scotia. Counties of previous residence in Canada were indicated for 233 of the 379 pioneers; all except 5 came from counties in Upper Canada, and the exceptions were all from Montreal. The most commonly named counties were those surrounding western Lake Ontario and between Hamilton and Windsor, with a particular concentration around London (see Figure 2). All of these areas lie directly east of southern Michigan. They were generally first inhabited in the late 1700s and early 1800s, and were heavily settled by American pioneers in the period preceding the War of 1812.

One of the commonly recognized characteristics of migration is that it may be linked or clustered; that is, relatives or neighbours moved from the same place to the same destination, sometimes in small, informal groups (linked) but other times in larger, more formal arrangements like colonies (clustered). In linked migration, return visits or letters to the old home extolling the opportunities discovered on the frontier did much to encourage others to move. In fact, some contemporary observers complained that many Upper Canadians were lured to the United States and within North America often brought relatives, neighbours, or larger groups of pioneers together to the frontier to settle close to one another. Researchers have uncovered specific examples of linked and clustered migration to Michigan through detailed work with name lists, local histories, and pioneers' biographies.[50] The land office records contain evidence that suggests linked or clustered migration, but because individual names were not collected by this researcher, it is impossible to tell if these pioneers were relatives who migrated together, neighbours who came as a group, or a random collection of persons who happened to migrate from the same county to the same county. The mapped distribution indicates that some counties provided more migrants to southern Michigan than others (see Figure 2). Five southern Michigan counties housed 184 of the 228 land purchasers from Upper Canada who identified counties of previous residence, and the settlement of land buyers from the same origin counties in the same destination counties also suggests that linked or clustered migration was a factor in the movement of Upper Canadians to southern Michigan (see Table 2). Major examples are the 29 settlers who moved from Halton County, Upper Canada to Sanilac County, Michigan, the 14 who came from Middlesex County, Upper Canada to Huron County, Michigan, and the 10 from Oxford County, Upper Canada who settled in Tuscola County, Michigan.

The second source of specific information about origin is the Michigan Pioneer Record, a genealogy of individual settlers being collected in an on-going program by the Library of Michigan. Because the record lists both counties of birth and previous residence for Michigan's early settlers, it is particularly valuable to the researcher. However, it must be used with caution because it is quite small and has not been assembled systematically. Only those who know about and are interested in the program have contributed genealogies of their pioneer ancestors; approximately four thousand for all of Michigan have been submitted thus far. The data used here include all pioneers who arrived in southern Michigan by 1850 and had some connection with Canada: they were born in Canada and migrated from there, they were born in the United States and migrated from Canada, or they were born in Canada and migrated from the United States.

The descendants of 89 Canadians have supplied the counties of birth and previous residence for settlers in southern Michigan. Their birthplaces are shown in Figure 3. Twenty settlers were born in the United States, primarily in western New England or central New York. They may have been Loyalists who fled from the United States or they may have migrated to Canada in the early 1800s searching for open land. Another 12 migrants were natives of Lower Canada, originating in counties close to the United States or Upper Canada. Most of the pioneers (57) hailed from Upper Canada, especially from regions surrounding Toronto, Hamilton, and London.

The previous places of residence of the 89 pioneers who were born in, or migrated from, Canada before settling in southern Michigan are shown in Figure 4. Only 8 native Canadians had lived in the United States before moving to Michigan, and they came from parts of northern or western New York that were close to Canada, or from northwestern Ohio. Eight others had moved from Lower Canada, mostly from the same counties in which they were born (see Figure 3). Again the majority of Canadians came from the upper province, and even more had lived in Upper Canada before migrating to Michigan than were born there, 73 versus 57, underscoring the importance of this part of Canada as a former frontier that supplied the newer frontier of southern Michigan. The pioneers' previous counties of residence were usually farther west than their birthplaces, lending further support to the notion that many settlers followed the westwardly advancing frontier by moving from the United States or eastern Canada to western Upper Canada and then to southern Michigan.[51] The distributions on both maps suggest that linked or clustered migration from Canada to southern Michigan may have occurred (Figures 3 and 4), but a closer look at individuals' movements is also suggestive (see Table 3). Because the Michigan Pioneer Record contains far fewer migrants than the land office records, the evidence is slighter and potentially biased but it is more comprehensive because it includes county of birth in addition to previous residence and destination counties. It appears that some settlers, particularly in Sanilac and Tuscola counties, may have migrated to Michigan in small groups.

Most migrants who were native to, or had lived in, Canada before settling in southern Michigan came from Upper Canada, particularly from counties directly east of their ultimate destination. Yet maps of the state-wide distribution of Canadian natives in 1850 and 1880 show that, while southern Michigan was the region where most Canadians lived, they were more dominant in areas farther north (see Figure 5). Large numbers of New Englanders and New Yorkers entered southern Michigan in the 1820s and 1830s before most Canadians began to arrive, and Yankees became influential there. Because they were first, they pre-empted most of the low-cost government land, including the land best suited to agriculture. Canadians migrating to southern Michigan, especially after the Rebellion of 1837, came too late to acquire good agricultural land directly from the government; this explains the relative paucity of Upper Canadian locations in the land office records. If they remained in southern Michigan, they had to buy from private individuals, land companies, or speculators at greater cost. In other words, southern Michigan was no longer the frontier of cheap and available land when most Canadians began migrating. Three related factors may explain why, although a moderate number of Canadians lived in southern Michigan by 1850, so few Canadians appear in the land office records: farmers looking for inexpensive land went elsewhere, bought farms from earlier pioneers, or found non-agricultural employment.

The territory northward in Michigan's Lower Peninsula and in the Upper Peninsula began to develop after 1840, about the same time that increasing numbers of Canadians were arriving in search of farm land or work in lumbering or mining. Here the census canvassers discovered Canadians to be a more significant element in the population than they had been farther south. In 1850 Canadians accounted for 17.9 per cent of the non-native population in Michigan's northern Lower Peninsula and Upper Peninsula, compared to 5.5 per cent state-wide, but one must remember that the total population in these sections was under seven thousand. By 1880 the percentage of the non-natives born in Canada had reached 28.0 in the northern Lower Peninsula and Upper Peninsula, compared to 17.9 per cent state-wide, and these sections now contained a population of 356,138. Less expensive land could be obtained in these newly developing areas, but its agricultural potential was limited by poorer soil and a more severe climate. As a result, many Canadians became heavily involved in the lucrative lumbering and mining activities that were rapidly expanding in northern Michigan and did not purchase land from the government.[52] And as the nineteenth century closed, Michigan's developing industrial base increased the demand for labour in the towns and cities, attracting Canadians and others.

natives in southern Michigan, for it was the first to record the country or state of birth for all free inhabitants. Tables showing the birthplaces of people living in each state and territory were published in 1850, indicating that Michigan housed 14,008 Canadians, who formed 5.5 per cent of the population not born in the state.[45] The number of Canadian settlers in each Michigan county can be found only by recording the birthplaces of individual respondents listed in the manuscript census. Microfilms of the manuscript census show that 13,134 Canadians lived in the thirty-three counties of southern Michigan and that they accounted for 5.1 per cent of the population not born in Michigan, slightly less than the state-wide average. In ten of the region's counties the proportion of Canadian natives exceeded the state-wide mean (see Figure 1). Not surprisingly, most Canadian natives lived in eastern Michigan, close to their former homes. Another group of pioneers lived in Ionia County, including the "Canadian Settlement" in Keene Township, and in Kent County.[46] Sanilac County contained the largest concentration of Canadian natives, accounting for 52.2 per cent of the population not born in Michigan. Wayne County housed 2,853 Canadians, more than any other county, but they made up only 10.5 per cent of the non-natives because Wayne was the state's most populous county. In counties where Canadian natives exceeded the state-wide mean, they formed an average of 16.6 per cent of the settlers not born in Michigan.

The province of birth for some Canadians can be determined from the census manuscripts. Census collection instructions required that place of birth be listed by state or country, but the canvassers in all except three southern Michigan counties recorded at least one province in what is now Canada. Nearly 10,800 settlers are listed simply as Canadian natives, either because the canvassers or respondents followed directions and generalized or because of the merging in 1841 of Upper and Lower Canada into the Province of Canada.[47] Sections of the country were identified by 2,342 natives, or almost 18 per cent of the Canadians living in southern Michigan (see Table 1). The majority of those who specified a portion of their country were born in Upper Canada (1,385, or 59.1 per cent) and about half as many in Lower Canada (577, or 24.6 per cent), followed in descending order by Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and Labrador. Upper Canadians exceeded Lower Canadians in nearly every county, but in southeastern Michigan French-Canadian settlements, many with origins before the American Revolution, were revealed by the number of Lower Canadian natives present: in Monroe County they surpassed the Upper Canadians, and in Wayne County their numbers were equal.

The place of origin of Canadians in southern Michigan can be identified even more precisely by two records that contain their counties or towns of origin.[48] One is the county Tract Books collected by the General Land Office. When people purchased Michigan acreage directly from the government, the land office recorded their previous country, state, and (usually) county of residence. The majority of former homes listed were in Michigan, but places in many other states and countries thousands of disbanded troops were removed from New England to New Brunswick. A number of Acadians who had established themselves at Fredericton were ordered to remove, for the purpose of accommodating a body of discharged soldiers. Those poor people, who had long been the sport of fortune, were finally settled at Madawasca, where their descendants now occupy an extensive and tolerably well-cultivated district.

It had been supposed that the Acadians, who had been driven from Fredericton, had at last found a resting-place; but in the recent settlement of the Boundary dispute, one part of Madawasca District has been assigned to Great Britain, and the other to the United States; and the divisional line has placed the same people under two different Governments.

In the above year great numbers of loyalists and refugees also removed to the Province, and the general improvement of the country commenced with extraordinary vigour. The Government offered every protection and assistance to those who had left their native homes, and sacrificed in many instances the ties of consanguinity and affection to their King and the British Constitution.

Each family received a certain quantity of land; and provisions were supplied to the destitute, until by their labour they should be able to maintain themselves.

In 1784, New Brunswick was separated from Nova Scotia, and made a distinct Government. General Carlton was appointed Governor on the 16th of August of the same year, and during his administration he made every effort to improve the state of the country. The Government has since been administered by a number of persons styled Lieutenant-Governors, or in their absence or demise by the senior member of the Executive Council for the time being.

The Free-will Baptists have no regular form of church government, and small congregations are frequently collected under different names, such as Christians, New Dispensationers, &c. Among them, we find Universalists, Swedenbourgians, Millerites, Latter-day Saints, and other names characteristic of wild enthusiasm and religious frenzy. About two thousand persons of all ages and sexes had assembled in a beautiful grove of pine, with all kinds of provisions, beds, and bedding. Hymns of fifteen verses were sung occasionally, and the well-known airs of "Days of Absence" and "Auld Lang-syne" were worn threadbare. Dear. Mrs. Wooley:

I received your letter of 6 Nov. 1997 asking me to search the Kings County Land Registry Records for the sale of the land of Joel Daniels. Since we have since then been subjected to a postal strike, I am sending this to the e-mail address you included.

Since I last wrote to you, I have abstracted the Kings County Registry Records for the early years and I have searched those records for references to Joel Daniels. The attached abstracts from Volumes E-1, F-1, H-1 and K-1 are all that I located. You will note that a few of them include him only as a witness. However I thought the names of others whose deeds Joel was witnessing might be of interest as well. I have tried to be thorough in including all pertinent information about the property descriptions and any names mentioned in the abstracts, omitting primarily the repetitious legalese. However, if you require copies of the complete documents, that would require a trip to the registry office, search fees and copying costs.

As you will note, it was the administrators of

Dear Fran.............

I assume you also sent yours of 2 August to Roy Adams as well, but just in case... I did e-mail the contents to him. I note that John Lawrence was born about the same time as Mary Lawrence, Dau of Richard & Mary . Was there any link between this John and our possible Richard of New Brunswick?

Roy just spent some time in Nova Scotia and NB this summer, so I will pass along his comments on that.

I spend most weekdays in the Newaygo area where I have a 3 season mobile at Hess Lake. I wade fish the Muskegon, White, and Pere Marquette rivers for trout, steelhead, and Salmon with east Michigan friends who recently relocated to the west side of the state. After the end of October until April I stay put in Wyoming MI having closed up the mobile home.

I do not have much info on "The Richard Lawrence " but Roy Adams might.

Glad to hear your interests in Florida escaped the storm and from what I hear most of the new storms moving in will hit further North and on the east coast.

Many thanks for the new information...and you are right. Assume you will be heading south in a month or so.

Subject: [Danielgenealogy] trip to NB and NS

Dear Folks

I am just back from my trip to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick where I visited historical museums in Shelburne, Kentville and Amherst NS and Hampton and Fredericton in New Brunswick. I found out where Daniel Bowen's original grant was located in Parrsborough and where he lived in Cornwallis. Also found out where both Joel and John Daniel's original grants were located. Thanks to a tip from Ann Ed, I got to visit the building where WD and Sarah Daniel got married in 1803. It is a small wooden building that is, incredibly, still in tact after over 250 years of use. It was first built by New England Planters in 1762. It is now an antique store.

JOEL DANIELS

Here is some of the new stuff I found out:

DANIEL BOWEN

On Daniel Bowen. His grant of 700 acres in Parrsborough was not very well located. It was 15-20 miles to the east of present day Parrsboro town. Although it did have frontage on the ocean, and was thus accessible by water, it was probably not good land to farm. I didn't find out where it was until after I had passed by that area and so did not get to visit it but from contemporary maps most of the lot appears to still be wilderness. There is a road that goes along the coast and through the claim, though, and so there may be some people living there. I suspect now that Bowen simply didn't bother taking up the grant. There is no mention of him in any of the books on the early history of Parrsborough that I could find.

DANIEL BOWEN

I got copies of several of Daniel Bowen's land transactions in Cornwallis in the 1790s and first decade of the 19th century. Bowen's land was on the Cornwallis river between present day Port Williams and Kentville. His land (at least part of it) had first been developed by the French Acadians before they were expelled by the Brits in 1755. The property was very fertile since it was part of a flood plane that was dyked against the high Bay of Fundy tides. In the area there is a Bowen Dyke but I think it must have been named for another Bowen because it is on a different River several miles away from our Bowen's land.

JOEL DANIEL

I also had a look at the tax lists for Cornwallis in 1791 and 1795. Old Dan'l was a wealthy guy. He must have been able to bring a good deal of his wealth from Jersey when he went north. At any rate, in 1791 there were three tax rates, one for the richest people, one for those in the middle and one for the poorer types. Dan was among the richest group in Cornwallis. In 1795 the tax must have been some percentage of wealth because each taxpayer paid a different amount. Daniel paid the second highest amount in the township.

3-

In 1806 Daniel gave son William Daniel part of his spread and made it legal by filing the proper documents. However, when they decided to go to Ontario the two pieces of property were sold as a single unit to a single buyer for a single price (1400 Lbs). So, reading between the lines, it seems to me that when they got to Ontario and bought the farm from Benajah Mallory, both families lived on it. There is no evidence that Dan Bowen bought a separate farm in Ontario and the price that WD paid Mallory was 1000 Lbs. not much less than had been received for the two farms in Cornwallis. I've wondered about how Sarah Daniel Bowen coped alone with young children while WD was away to war. Most likely Uncle Daniel ran the farm and Aunt Sarah helped with the kids.

JOEL DANIELS

On Joel: I found his Penniac land grant in the New Brunswick Archives in Fredericton. On the grant map, his name is spelled Joel Donalds. There is a road that runs along the Penniac. It is a small country road with smallish houses owned, no doubt, by not very wealthy people. There was only one farm along the road, sitting in a low spot. Joel's land was on a big hill. Even today the land in back of the houses appears to be wilderness. Joel's grant was number 14. Number one is closest to the navigable Nashwaak River. The Penniac is just a stream that is not navigable most of the year. So Joel had to struggle through 4 or 5 miles of bush to get to his claim.

JOEL DANIELS

I also drove through Maugerville (which I was told is pronounced majorville) and Burton townships where Joel seems to have set up household for awhile, probably between about 1789 and 1796 when he got the contract to build Trinity Church and moved to Sussex. Maugerville is on the north bank of the St. John River and is not far downriver from Fredericton. It had been settled by New Englanders before the Revolution and there was probably enough work there to keep a carpenter busy.

JOEL DANIELS

Sussex Vale, the area to which Joel and family moved next, encompasses several little towns. The church that Joel built (Trinity) sat in what is today Sussex Corner. On the same plot is present day St Marks. Joel's church burned down sometime late in the 19th century according to Grace Aiton's history of the area. Although it lasted for nearly a century, Aiton reports that it was not constructed all that well. The steeple, apparently, was not attached properly causing frequent repairs. In her history of the Sussex area, Aiton says that Joel died before Trinity was completed but he must have put up most of it. It was begun in 1796 and people began to attend services in 1805 two years before Joel died.

After my visit I am puzzled by the report that in 1802 Joel and others petitioned for a minister to be able to legalize marriages. Sussex, where he was living by then, had an Anglican Minister fully competent to perform legal marriages by 1792. The Baptists were not given that authority until 1835.

JOEL DANIELS

In 1802 Joel bought land on the Millstream river and sold his property in Sussex. I did get to drive along the Millstream Creek and it is very fertile farmland today. I didn't have the map with me that has John, Henry and James's claims on it, so could not get to them specifically but the brothers probably would have done fine if they had stayed in NB.

Despite all of the apparent adversity that he faced, by 1800 Joel was doing ok. In that year he paid a Shilling in tax which put him in about the middle of Sussex taxpayers. He had two horses, a cow and 13 sheep on 6 acres of developed land (although the property that he owned was likely much more extensive). But he also had a mortgage.

I also found out that Sussex had a very nice schoolhouse early on. It was built with missionary money in order to educate Indians and some did attend but the majority of kids attending were those of settlers. In general, the Indians were wary of Anglo institutions. Maybe Joel's kids attended.

My trip got me to thinking more about the relationship between Joel and Daniel Bowen. I now suspect that in addition to being Bowen's brother in law, Joel was also Bowen's apprentice. Joel's father died when he was not yet 5 and, although she remarried when he was 7, mother Rebecca may well have been looking for opportunities to get her children settled. John Daniel went to live with his uncle, for example, and Sarah married at the young age of 17. Placing Joel under the authority of a successful guy like Daniel Bowen would have solved one of Rebecca's problems. Joel joined the British Army when he was 17 and served as a soldier throughout the Rev War but still arrived in Canada with carpentry skills. The close ties between the two men suggest more than a standard brother in law relationship. ?

Joel b— 1759

As I go through my notes and the documents I collected I'll make further reports.

To the Honorable Cornelius O'Flynne Judge of Probate for the County of Wayne aforesaid

The petition of Joel Daniels of the County of Washtenaw in said State respectfully represents:

That he is the legal guardian of John Daniels a minor above the age of fourteen years, of Clarissa Jane Daniels, Charles W Daniels, Francis A Daniels and Henry H Daniels all minors under the age of fourteen years, heirs at law of James Daniels late of Dearborn in the said County of Wayne deceased; that said minors are each as heirs at law aforesaid owners of one undivided eighth part of a certain tract or parcel of land lying situate & being in said town of Dearborn in the County of Wayne & State aforesaid, with the appurtenances, subject however to the dower of Sabrina Daniels ~~therein~~ widow of said James Daniels deceased therein; that said tract or parcel of land is known and described as follows viz- The South East half of the South East quarter of Section twenty and the South East quarter of the North east ~~half~~ quarter of section twenty and thirty three acres from off the East side of the West half of the South East quarter of Section twenty all in said Township of Dearborn in the County of Wayne aforesaid Containing One hundred and fifty three acres or thereabouts be the same more or less;

Your petitioner further represents that the said John Daniels is of the age of nineteen years or thereabouts and is now a resident of Wisconsin – that he is desirous to sell his said interest in said land. which is held in common with seven other heirs of said James Daniels deceased, all of whom except the minors herein named are of lawful age and are also desirous of selling their interests in the same –

Your petitioner further represents that it would be for the benefit of said John Daniels that his undivided interest therein should be sold and the proceeds thereof be put out on interest or invested in some other manner; that said farm with so many undivided and small interests cannot be productively managed nor can the same be partitioned amongst the heirs at law without materially damaging the value thereof

Your petitioner further represents that ~~th~~ he has in his hands no goods Chattles rights nor credits of the said minors Clarissa Jane Daniels, Charles W Daniels Frances A Daniels and Henry H Daniels. nor of either of said minors –

; and that said minors are indebted to your petitioner, as by his account now rendered in Court will appear, for board, Clothing Money paid and other disbursements to the amount of about Eighty dollars each or thereabouts after the deduction of all credits that there is no personal property nor is there share of the income of said Estate sufficient to pay said just debt with the Charges of managing their said Estates – that said four ~~last~~ minors last above named are of tender age – the Eldest being about thirteen years of age & the youngest between six and seven years of age – that the income of said real Estate of said four minors last above named is insufficient to maintain and Educate them

Your petitioner therefore represents that it is both necessary and expedient and for the benefit of said minors that their interest in said above described real Estate should be sold according to the Statutes in such case made & provided

And your petitioner prays your Honor to grant him a license pursuant to law to sell the interest of the said John Daniels in said real Estate for the investment of the proceeds thereof on interest; and also a license to sell the interests of the said Clarissa Jane, Charles H., Francis A., Henry H Daniels minors as aforesaid to pay the just debts of the said minors & to invest the residue of the proceeds of the sale of their respective Shares on interest for the Education and maintenance of said minors respectively. And your petitioner will ever pray &c
